Outpatient treatment of medication-overuse headache. The outpatient treatment of medication-overuse headache (MOH) is a very challenging and complex problem. There are many misconceptions among patients and physicians that preclude most patients from seeking medication-overuse headache-specific treatment. Each patient is an individual and requires a tailored approach that considers the characteristics of each individual. For many patients, the key to success is educating the patient on the pathophysiology of headache and why treating their "medication-overuse" headache is a necessity, rather than a choice. For the patient, educational interventions include increasing knowledge of headache and its implications, decreasing overuse of medications, and adopting a lifestyle that will minimize the use of headache medications. For physicians, the education of patients regarding these issues is of utmost importance in order to treat successfully. Physicians who are trained in headache medicine must educate their patients regarding medication-overuse issues, must prescribe for the many headache disorders that are currently under-treated, and must be knowledgeable about effective strategies for treating overused medications. Interferon alfa is one of the most commonly used treatments for viral hepatitis. While it is generally effective in reducing hepatitis virus load, its main limitation is its lack of selectivity. Excessive expression of IFNalpha throughout the body is thought to be responsible for the wide array of toxicity that it causes, particularly the severe depression of cell-mediated immunity that is so characteristic of the syndrome. One strategy to decrease the induction of IFNalpha synthesis is to design small organic compounds that function as transcriptional inhibitors. This proposal targets the Janus-associated kinase 2 (JAK2) kinase which is activated by interferon receptor complex ligation and whose activation is required to initiate downstream signaling events. The objective is to identify, and then test in cell culture and in vivo, small molecule compounds that are specific inhibitors of IFNalpha action. The reasoning for employing a "hit-to-lead" strategy on this target is that it is likely to be a conserved site of inhibition and that it
